PREFACE

In this translation of the Piṭakat-tō-sa-muiṅ: (Piṭ-sm) I have followed the spelling of the original text except where there are obvious mistakes. This means that Pāḷi words taken over in Burmese are often changed:

Vowels are often lengthened, especially final vowels (for example, -pūra for -pura, sīri for sirī or siri, Sāriputtā for Sāriputta).

The final vowel may be deleted (for example, nikāy for nikāya, paṭṭhān: for paṭṭhāna).

The final one or two syllables may be deleted with the first consonant being retained in the case of a double consonant (for example, parit for paritta, parivā for parivāra, pācit for pācittiya, jāt for jātaka, -vaṅ for -vaṃsa).

When the final vowel is preceded by a double consonant and the second consonant is deleted, the remaining consonant may be nasalized (for example, vinaññ: for vinaya).

When the final vowel is deleted, the remaining vowel may be changed (for example, yamuik for yamaka, pud for pada);

Syllables may be deleted at the beginning and end of a word (for example, laṅkā for alaṅkāra).

The end of the word may be so changed that it is difficult to recognize the origin (for example, saṅgruih from Sanskrit saṅgraha but used in titles that end in the Pāḷi saṅgaha).[1]

Dates can vary by a year more or less due to differences between the Burmese calendar and the Western calendar.

As mentioned in the notes on transliteration and transcription, names are transliterated following the table given below, and common transcriptions are often given in parentheses to facilitate consultation of other sources. For example, Anok-bhak-lvan has been transcribed Anaukpetlun, Bha-krī:-tō has been transcribed Bagyidaw.

Hyphens are used more generously than is usually the case in an effort to make it easy to avoid confusion of the division of syllables in Burmese words.

As much information about Burmese texts and authors is available only in Burmese texts, details have been added in the notes to help scholars. Tables are also added to make it easier to sort out the Burmese dynasties.

I wish to thank the Council of the Pali Text Society for giving me the opportunity to translate this text, and I am grateful for all the help given by U Nyunt Maung, retired Librarian, Universities Central Library, Rankun, Dr William Pruitt, and Dr Heinz Braun.

TRANSLITERATIONS AND TRANSCRIPTIONS

REMARKS CONCERNING THE TRANSLITERATION AND TRANSCRIPTION USED IN THIS TEXT

There has never been an internationally accepted agreement concerning the transliteration or the transcription of Burmese characters into roman script. Unfortunately, attempts at this seem to indicate that there never will be general agreement. The two procedures are obviously very different from one another.

Given the circumstances, a table of the method used in transliterating Burmese characters is necessary. The method of transliterating Burmese used here is based on a table that was produced during a seminar taught by Mme Denis Bernot at the École pratique des Hautes Études in Paris. The seminar was held at a time when it seemed necessary to adapt a method that would not go beyond the limits of manual typewriters. Certain characters that resembled roman punctuation, such as the colon, were used to transliterate Burmese. That principle has been followed here, but to avoid confusion between Burmese tonal marks and roman colons and periods, the Burmese characters written with small circles rather than dots are used (so : and ̥ rather than : and ̣).

The main requirement for a system of transliteration is that it makes it possible to transcribe the text back into the original characters. As there is no generally accepted system, each text using Burmese transliteration should include a table showing the method used. It will be obvious that the transliteration into roman script cannot take into account the way a letter or word is pronounced in Burmese.

The consonants use one letter or one letter plus h (aspirates) for the transliteration. There is only one case where the transliteration of a vowel uses two letters, and in this case (-ui for ို) Burmese itself uses those two separate vowel markers for a third vowel. Burmese also uses two vowel markers for one other vowel (ော), but only one letter (o) is needed to transliterate this. Several letters are transliterated differently to the table established by the seminar: ၌ (ña rather than ña for Pāḷi and Ña for Burmese), ၍ (*ññ*a rather than *ññ*a for Pāḷi and ña for Burmese), ဝ and ် ဝ (va or -va rather than va or -va for Pāḷi and wa or -wa for Burmese), အ and အာ (a and ā rather than a and ā for Pāḷi and 'a and 'ā for Burmese). For initial vowels other than a and ā, all those using the character အ as a base for the usual vowel marks represent the character by an inverted comma ('). Initial vowels written using their own character do not use the inverted comma (for example, အဲ is transliterated 'è, ဲ is transliterated è).

Transcribing Burmese words is more complicated than transliterating. Most transcriptions have attempted to use combinations that will indicate to an English speaker the pronunciation of the Burmese word. This is a hopeless endeavour because English does not have a standard set of letters resulting in a standard pronunciation. So anyone writing about Burma in a Western language is constantly confronted with the problem of which transcription of names and words to follow. The names of Burmese authors and religious figures pose problems of their own because several different spellings have been used for one name (both in Burmese and in transcription; see, for example, the different spelling used for U Budh as listed in BM I, p. xiv.). What is more, Burmese authors often use one or more pseudonyms, and Burmese monks will have one name as a layman, one name as a novice, one name as a monk (although this is often the same as the name as a novice), a name associated with a title, and one or more honorific titles granted by a king or by the state. Transliterated proper nouns based on the orginal Burmese version of the text have been used here, and transcription variants are cross referenced in the indexes.
